Abstract

The residual effects of bioslurry and composted poultry manure on soil properties and subsequent crop productivity have not yet been studied in detail under humid subtropical conditions of Pakistan. Therefore, field studies were conducted at Gujjar Seed and Nursery Farm, Haripur, Pakistan, during 2012-2013 to determine the residual effects of different nitrogen (N) sources and tillage systems on soil properties and subsequent wheat crop in a randomized-complete-block-design with split-plot arrangement and four replicates. The tillage systems (minimum, conventional and deep) were distributed in main plots, while N sources (bioslurry, poultry manure and chemical fertilizer) with three percentages of recommended N application rates (100, 50 and 25%) that were applied to previous maize crops, were distributed in sub-plots. The results showed that N treatments significantly ($p < 0.05$) affected soil properties (total soil N, available soil phosphorus (P), potassium (K) and soil organic matter (SOM) contents), wheat productivity (plant height, spike length, 1000-grain weight, grain yield and biological yield), and plant N, P and K concentrations in plant shoots at crop harvest. By contrast, tillage systems had a non-significant ($p > 0.05$) effect on all the parameters except SOM contents. The interactive effect of tillage systems and N treatments were significant ($p < 0.05$) on 1000-grain weight, soil total N, soil available P, K, and SOM contents at wheat harvest. It is concluded that application of bioslurry and composted poultry manure has residual effects on the next crop and has potential to increase yield of subsequent crop by reducing the cost of chemical fertilizer.
