

5.5 The rise of the novel

The literature of the 18th century reflected the economic and intellectual progress of the period and a growing popular interest in reading. Lending or circulating libraries acquired great importance and since subscriptions were moderately priced, they led to an increase in the reading public.

Writing became a profession ruled by economic criteria, and the value of an author depended on the number of pages he or she wrote. More printed items were produced, and literacy increased. Around 60% of the adult male and 40% of the adult female population could read. More and more readers belonged to the middle and lower classes. People preferred prose to verse and drama. They liked reading about the practical needs of different trades, stories about pirates and thieves, accounts of crime, political pamphlets and newspapers, and novels about journeys to distant countries.

The belief in the power of reason and the individual's trust in his own abilities found expression in the novel. By definition, a novel is 'a long prose narrative about largely fictional, if usually realistic, characters and plausible events'.

In 18th-century novels, the stories were usually told with the events given in chronological sequence. The narration was in the first person (I, we) or the third person (he, she, they). The setting was given great attention with specific references to particular times of the year or of the day, and to the names of countries, streets and towns. All the characters were given contemporary names and surnames to reinforce the impression of realism. The hero of the novel was always the middle-class or 'bourgeois man' with his problems. He was usually struggling either for survival or social success. The hero was a mouthpiece for the author and the reader was expected to sympathise with him. The language adopted was simple and factual.

The 18th-century novelist was the spokesman for the middle class. The realism of the novel was not linked to the kind of life presented, but to the way it was shown. The writer's primary aim was to write in a simple way in order to be understood even by less well-educated readers. The novel, which was primarily concerned with everything that could alter social status, was particularly appealing to the practical-minded tradesman, who was self-made and self-reliant. The sense of reward and punishment, which was the 'message' of the novel itself, was related to the Puritan ethics of the middle classes.

1 READ about the rise of the novel in the 18th century and do the following activities.

- 1 State what led to the increase in the reading public.
- 2 Explain what kind of people read and what they enjoyed reading.
- 3 List the features shared by the 18th-century novels.
- 4 Sum up the 18th-century novelist's aim and the message he wanted to convey.
