Abstract: The emergence of smart cards is a significant achievement in the field of information technology. They are growing in importance as they offer secure data storage and authentication, improve security, simplify processes, reduce costs, and have a variety of applications. In particular, nowadays SIM cards play a vital role in the Telecom industry as an important type of smart card that allows a user to make calls, send messages, store details such as phone number and network authentication information, and provide various mobile data services. Currently, some leading companies take advantage of having their own smart card operating systems and have significant impact on the market on various issues (hardware on which the smart card operating system will run; security restrictions; control, permission and control of any application, etc.). It is important to work on creating a more flexible, adaptable and secure operating system infrastructure in order to overcome these limitations both in the customer perspective and in the ecosystem. The purpose of this research is to introduce the creation of a special Java Card operating system designed for SIM cards used in the Telecom industry. The study presents the software requirements and development steps of the proposed operating system and innovative architectural components necessary for its operation as a SIM card beyond being a Java Card operating system. The proposed new Java Card based SIM operating system is expected to pave the way for the development of eSIM operating system infrastructure as well as 5G technology and offer valuable opportunities.

1. INTRODUCTION

The advent of smart cards represents a significant accomplishment in the realm of information technology. They are becoming increasingly important due to their ability to provide secure data storage and authentication, enhance security, streamline processes, reduce costs, and be used in a wide range of applications [1-3]. Smart cards are small plastic cards that contain embedded microchips that can store and process data. Smart cards have proven to be a reliable and secure way to store and transmit data, and they can be used in a wide range of industries and applications, including banking, healthcare, transportation, loyalty programs and government [3-5]. They can also be used in combination with other technologies such as biometric authentication, making them even more versatile.

Basically the lifecycle of smart cards involves chip design and manufacturing, card manufacturing, personalization, issuance, usage, renewal or replacement, and end of life [1, 3]. The smart card operating system (OS) plays a crucial role in the lifecycle of a smart card by providing a secure platform for running applications and managing resources [3, 6-8]. A smart card OS as a software platform, runs on a smart card's embedded microchip and provides the ability to perform various functions, including data storage, encryption, authentication, and processing. It serves as the intermediary between the card's hardware and the applications that run on the card. It manages the card's resources and provides a secure environment for running applications, ensuring the confidentiality, integrity, and availability of the data stored on the card. It facilitates the development of a wide range of applications and services, such as payment systems, identification and access control systems, and secure storage of personal data.

The smart card OS provides a secure environment, a secure element for storing and processing data on the card, secure authentication using such as PINs, passwords, or biometric data, and cryptographic functions for enabling secure communication and data transfer [3, 9]. It is designed to protect sensitive information from unauthorized access and tampering, providing the card with the ability to securely perform a range of functions, such as electronic payment, access control, and healthcare applications. Also, the smart card OS manages multiple applications running on the card, ensuring that they are isolated from each other and preventing interference between them [6-8]. Some of the commonly used smart card operating systems include Java Card, MULTOS, Global Platform, and Microsoft Windows for Smart Cards. Each of these operating systems has its strengths and weaknesses, and selection of a
