

Excavating the shelter for the antenna. Building the concrete pad.

2-) Dish alignment

Installing the antenna on the support frame.

Step3. VSAF Equipment mounting

Building the antenna is time consuming, depending upon its size it may take from one day to three days. The larger antennas may need the help of a crane to position them on the mounting supports. The bolts that connect the antenna position should be left loose to enable final alignment with the satellite. Typically, the transceiver is mounted on the antenna support frame, with the RF cables being connected back into the building where the modem and Internet routers are housed.

All items of equipment should be powered via a UPS to prevent damage in the event of power cuts.

Step 4. Antenna Alignment

Alignment of the antenna.

An experienced engineer using a spectrum analyzer best performs this task. The satellites are located a few degrees apart, finding the target satellite is a very difficult task. A professional installer will find a satellite in a matter of a few hours. Installers with less experience can take weeks of frustrating effort before getting the correct alignment.

The final step in alignment is the Polar and Azimuth procedure with the satellite operations centre. They will assist in co-ordinate alignment of the antenna and the polarisation in order to ensure that the antenna is not interfering with adjacent satellites or with other poles on the same satellite.
