

Experiment 3: Equilibrium of Concurrent Forces

Purpose

- (1) To become familiar with vectors, their components, their addition and subtraction.
- (2) To study the equilibrium of coplanar forces intersecting at a point.

Apparatus

Force-Table, slotted weights

Theory

There are basically two types of quantities in physics: scalar quantities and vector quantities.

Scalars:

A scalar is a quantity, which is simply a number. Examples of scalars are: 32 ft, 10 kg, and 8.6 s.

Vectors:

A vector is a quantity, which has both a magnitude (which is just a scalar), and a direction (which tells you which way the vector is pointing). You can think of a vector as an arrow. In fact an arrow is the graphical symbol used for drawing a vector on paper. A chosen scale appropriate for the drawing represents the magnitude, and the direction is given by the angle the vector (arrow) makes with the positive x-direction, measured counterclockwise from 0° to 360° .

Forces are one example of vectors. (Others are 'x' for displacement, 'v' for velocity, and 'a' for acceleration. Still others will be discussed throughout the course of physics.)

E.g. a force P of magnitude 120 N is acting at angle $\theta = 200^\circ$ would be drawn as shown in Fig. 1. You can check with ruler and compass that this drawing is reasonably accurate.

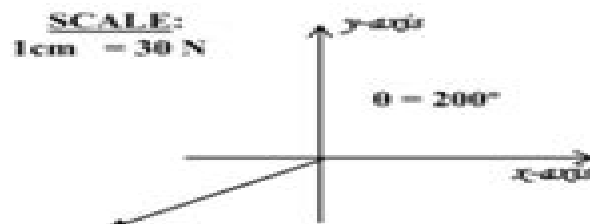

Fig. 1. Graph of force \vec{P}

A given vector \vec{A} can be decomposed into its components A_x and A_y (see Fig. 2.).
