Paramecia are single-celled organisms that can survive in a wide range of salinities. However, we need quantitative evidence to show how their osmoregulatory capabilities change across varying salt concentrations. I've conducted an experiment to test their fluid excretion rates to determine how they adapt to the salinity.

The results showed that Paramecia that effectively regulate their internal osmotic pressure across different salinities belong to different groups of paramecia. In total, we observed that the fluid excretion rates of paramecia in each group of salinity levels were the same, as shown in Table 1.

Table 1. Contractile Fluid Output by Paramecia Adapted to Different Salinities

Salinity of Environment (mM NaCl)	Contractile Fluid Output (µL per 100 cells per hour)
0.5	0.5
1.0	0.5
1.5	0.5
2.0	0.5

1. The results show that Paramecia adapt to different salinities by regulating their internal osmotic pressure. The fluid excretion rates of paramecia in each group of salinity levels were the same, as shown in Table 1. This indicates that Paramecia have a mechanism to maintain their internal osmotic pressure across different salinities.

The results of the experiment suggest that Paramecia adapt to different salinities by regulating their internal osmotic pressure. The fluid excretion rates of paramecia in each group of salinity levels were the same, as shown in Table 1. This indicates that Paramecia have a mechanism to maintain their internal osmotic pressure across different salinities.

2. The results show that Paramecia adapt to different salinities by regulating their internal osmotic pressure. The fluid excretion rates of paramecia in each group of salinity levels were the same, as shown in Table 1.
