

Climate Finance: Call for Research Proposals

Sponsors: Norges Bank Investment Management, Columbia University, Review of Financial Studies, program chair Harrison Hong and José Scheinkman; sponsoring editor: Andrew Karolyi
New York City: November 30, 2017
Submission Deadline: July 30, 2017

OVERVIEW

Global warming and climate change present serious risks for corporate profits and capital markets. Many sectors, ranging from energy, food, insurance to real estate, are concerned about risks generated by a potential price on carbon, adverse shocks to agricultural productivity, or exposures to rising sea levels, to name a few. Capital markets, to the extent that they can assess and price these exposures, can potentially help households and institutions hedge climate change risks. Climate science has generated increasingly precise, accessible, and long historical parcel data sets on a range of climate variables that allow for measurement and assessment of these risks on capital markets over the past century. Capital markets research that integrates these new data can spur the development of new methodologies and findings to help us address these important issues that affect the welfare of current and future generations, particularly those living in less-developed or emerging markets.

To promote research on issues that bear on the financial economics of climate change, Columbia University and the Review of Financial Studies, with the support of Norges Bank Investment Management, are issuing a call for proposals that will culminate in two research conferences. The conferences will be organized by Harrison Hong and José Scheinkman of Columbia University, and Andrew Karolyi of Cornell University and the Executive Editor of the Review of Financial Studies.

The organizers recognize that this proposed body of research is new and there are few quality working papers at this point. As such, the format of the conference will follow a novel two-stage editorial process. This process is designed to encourage researchers to engage in innovative research on this new emerging topic.

In the first stage, there is a call for research proposals in which authors outline the questions they will address, the methodologies they will use, the model framework they will explore (in the case of theory work) or the data they will gather (in the case of empirical work) and in which they will offer as much detail as possible on the research design and analyses used to interpret the results. Members of a scientific committee, the program organizers, and the sponsoring editor evaluate the likelihood that the project will significantly extend our understanding of Climate Finance to be a good fit upon completion for the Review of Financial Studies. Researchers of selected proposals will be invited to a workshop, to be held in New York in November 2017, to present their proposals to the peer authors and other invited experts for feedback. The organizers are especially interested in proposals linking scientific data on climate change to finance and economic questions and expect 8-10 successful proposals to receive invitations to the workshop.

Accepted proposals will continue to the second stage with another conference for completed papers in 2018, following the standard format. These presentations will describe the original
