

Neural Correlates of Cognitive Processing in Monolinguals and Bilinguals

Abstract

The present paper reviews the neural correlates of cognitive control associated with bilingualism. We demonstrate that lifelong practice managing two languages orchestrates global changes to both structure and function of the brain. Compared to monolinguals, bilinguals generally show greater gray matter volume, especially in perceptual/motor regions, greater white matter integrity, and greater functional connectivity between gray matter regions. These changes complement EEG findings showing that bilinguals devote neural resources earlier than monolinguals. Parallel functional findings emerge from the fMRI literature: Bilinguals show reduced frontal activity suggesting that they do not need to rely on top-down mechanisms to the same extent as monolinguals. This shift for bilinguals to rely more on subcortical/posterior regions, which we term the bilingual anterior to posterior and subcortical shift (BAPSS), fits with results from cognitive aging studies and helps to explain why bilinguals experience cognitive decline at later stages of development than monolinguals.

Introduction

It is well documented that both languages in a bilingual mind are jointly activated^{1,2}. Therefore, bilinguals must constantly manage attention to two languages that compete for selection³, a situation that leads to neuroplastic changes in the brain³. An emerging idea is that this lifelong experience managing linguistic conflict leads to domain-general cognitive changes to both the structure and function of the brain⁴. Understanding how bilingualism contributes to neuroplasticity is especially important considering recent evidence that bilingualism protects against age-related cognitive decline. For example, Bialystok, Craik, and Freedman⁵ demonstrated that the onset of symptoms of dementia was four years later for bilinguals than monolinguals, a finding that has been replicated in different populations (for reviews, see ^{6,7}). Other studies have shown that among Alzheimer's disease patients, bilinguals perform equivalently on cognitive tests even when their brains show more disease-related atrophy than monolinguals⁸. What remains unknown are the precise mechanisms impacted by bilingual experience that reshape the brain and lead to these protective effects. Our proposal is that the changes in brain structure and function attributed to bilingualism lead to improved efficiency in domain-general cognitive processing.

There is substantial evidence that verbal and non-verbal cognitive tasks recruit overlapping brain networks and processes in bilinguals (for reviews, see 9,10) supporting the argument that domain-general resources are involved in learning a second language. Here we review magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) and electroencephalography (EEG) studies to examine the bases for differences between monolinguals and bilinguals in domain-general cognitive processing. Contrary to some previous reviews¹¹, we argue that the literature is largely consistent and we provide a theoretical framework to understand how second-language experience leads to the greater cognitive efficiency found for bilinguals.

The present review converges on five important findings. First, bilinguals generally show greater gray matter volume than monolinguals in multiple areas of the brain, especially in perceptual/motor regions. Second,
