Fuel System

The general arrangement of the fuel system is shown in Fig. 10. It includes the fuel tank, fuel pump, filter, pressure-reducing valve and pressure sensor with restriction, injection pump with centrifugal governor, injectors and pipe lines.

The fuel pump, which is a diaphragm pump driven by the engine crankshaft, sucks fuel from the tank and feeds it through the filter to the injection pump which delivers it to the combustion chambers of the engine under high pressure.

The injection pump is of the inline type and operates in common stroke. It has pump elements consisting of a plunger and cylinder for each engine cylinder. The pump plungers draw their supply from a chamber fitted in the lower part of the pump body. A control rod which runs along the length of the pump turns the plungers and thereby regulates the amount of fuel injected. The control rod is connected to the centrifugal governor.

The centrifugal governor automatically adjusts the amount of fuel injected to the speed and loading of the engine.

Both the pump and centrifugal governor are lubricated through the engine lubricating system, so that no special oil feed channels are necessary.

In some cases the engine is equipped with a speed limiting device which is fitted on the injection pump; see Fig. 8.

The speed limiting device is there to limit the engine maximum output to the highest gear so that the maximum (i.e., permissible) speed is not exceeded.

This speed limiting device is operated by the engine oil pressure and an electromagnetic valve which is placed under the valve.
