Sun Tzu advocated it in his time as a means to gain an advantage and the same holds true today But deception is not infallible or inevitable its effects can be countered by the operational commander This paper explores a general theory of logic for the operational commander to counter deception Before a commander can counter deception he must understand the theories principles and techniques used by the enemy First the theory of deception will be studied based on the premise that deception is misperception The structure of deception the hiding of the real and the showing the false will be examined Then the operational principles and techniques that are used to build a successful stratagem will be explored Armed with this knowledge the commander is then able to identify the weakness and vulnerabilities of any deception operation Using this baseline and answering four fundamental questions he can build a thought process to analyze his intelligence and arrive at a logical conclusion of enemy capabilities or course of action With a thorough understanding of deception why how and to what end the enemy will use it and through some anti deception efforts of his own the operational commander can counter the effects of deception

Deception, Counterdeception and the Future, 1996 Deception and surprise have been an integral part of war since the beginning of recorded history This force multiplier continues to be used to the present time because the surprising truth is that it almost always works A determined adversary bent on deception and willing to invest the required time and resources will be successful and can achieve initial surprise Counterdeception is a difficult task and despite America s demonstrated intelligence collection capability will not likely prove effective much of the time While there are techniques that can reduce vulnerability to deception and surprise the best option is to assume that sooner or later your adversary will achieve some deception successes and plan accordingly American officers operating as opposing forces commanders at the National Training Center in California are already successfully manipulating intelligence indicators and deceiving our collection platforms It will not be long until our adversaries learn to do the same
