

UME 2003 Questions Type 9

Read passages I and II carefully and answer the questions that follow.

Passage I

Attitudes toward the smoking of cigarettes and the consumption of alcohol may be used to illustrate typical African ethics. Apart from the fact that smoking has now been linked with the lung cancer disease, the African moralist has always regarded smoking as an indication of moral degradation. A number of people have accepted the moralist idea on smoking. Some have refrained from smoking, and those who could influence others, such as parents and religious leaders, have also exerted their influence to prevent others from smoking. On the other hand, a good many people have remained indifferent to the moralist view and have continued to smoke. The same argument has been applied to the consumption of alcohol. The African moralist, basing his judgement on the behaviour of a few alcoholics, tends to regard the habit of taking alcohol as a sign of wretchedness. The moralist holds the view that anybody who forms the habit of consuming alcohol will never do well in life. While this may be true in respect of a few people in the society, the fear of the moralist has not been justified. However, the economist is primarily interested in the habit of smoking and the consumption of alcohol in so far as they give satisfaction to smokers and drinkers and so generate supply of and demand for tobacco and alcohol. The economist is interested in knowing how many packets of cigarettes are consumed and to what extent an increase or fall in consumption could affect production, that is, supply. Similarly, he is interested in how much beer is consumed and how the supply of beer will adjust to the demand for it. He examines the habits and the pressures which can lead to the readjustment of wants and the reallocation of resources to cover the wants.

Some moral principles associated with religion tend to lead on to economic problems. Followers of certain religions are expected not to consume pork, take alcohol or smoke tobacco. Devotees of some religious groups, on the other hand, can eat pork while others are expected to abstain from alcohol and smoking. Strict observance of these moral rule could cripple the breweries, the cigarette factories and some businesses however, there seems to be a growing number of alcohol consumers and cigarette smokers, a development which should be of interest to the economist.

1. According to the passage, the moralist idea is that
 - A. people should accept a point of view only when they are convinced.
 - B. smoking is not good but a little alcohol may be permitted.
 - C. the smoking of cigarettes is bad and unacceptable.
 - D. it is typically African not to smoke cigarettes.
2. It can be concluded from the passage that morality religion and economy are
 - A. somewhat interconnected.
 - B. clearly interconnected.
 - C. certainly unrelated.
 - D. certainly different.
3. Which of the following statements is true according to the passage?
 - A. Everyone ignores the moralist view on drinking and smoking.
 - B. Total abstinence from drinking and smoking is a religious obligation.
 - C. People who drink or smoke surely die of cancer.
 - D. Smoking and drinking may have positive effects on the economy.
