The house and its lawn of mud recede behind us; I watch them out of the back window of the car, from where I sit jammed in among boxes of food, the sleeping bags and raincoats. I'm wearing a blue striped jersey of my brother's, and a worn pair of corduroy trousers. Grace and Carol stand under the apple trees, in their skirts, waving, disappearing. They still have to go to school, I don't, I envy them. Already the tarry, rubbery travel smell is wrapping itself around me, but I don't welcome it. I'm being wrenched away from my new life, the life of girls.

I settle back in the familiar perspective, the backs of heads, the ears, and past them the white line of the highway. We drive up through meadowy farmlands, with their silos, their elms and their smell of hay. The broad-leafed trees become smaller, there are more pines, the air cools, the sky turns an icier blue: we're heading away from Spring. We hit the first ridges of mountains, the forest, lakes; there's snow in the shadows. I sit forward, leaning my arms on the back of the front seat. I feel like a dog, ears pricked and sniffing.

The north smells different from the city: clearer, thinner

I've forgotten about these things all winter, but here they are again, and when I see them, I remember them, I know them, I greet them as if they are home.

Men stand on corners, outside general stores, outside banks, outside beer parlours with grey asphalt shingles on the walls. They have their hands in their jacket pockets. Some have dark Indian looking faces; others are merely tanned. They walk differently from men in the south, slower, more considering; they say less, and their words are farther apart. My father jingles his keys and the change in his pockets while he talks to them. They talk about water levels, the dryness of the forests, how the fish are biting. "Chewing the fat", he calls it. He comes back to the car with a brown paper bag of groceries and packs it in behind my feet.
