ABSTRACT

One of the most commonly accepted models of relationships among three variables in applied industrial and organizational psychology is the simple moderator effect. However, many authors have expressed concern over the general lack of empirical support for interaction effects reported in the literature. We demonstrate in the current sample that use of a continuous, dependent-response scale instead of a discrete, Likert-type scale, causes moderated regression analysis effect sizes to increase an average of 93%. We suggest that use of relatively coarse Likert scales to measure fine dependent responses causes information loss that, although varying widely across subjects, greatly reduces the probability of detecting true interaction effects. Specific recommendations for alternate research strategies are made.

An earlier version of this article was presented at the 30th Annual Meeting of the Southern Management Association, November 1991, Atlanta, Georgia. We would like to thank our colleagues around the United States who participated in this study (especially Dale Rude and Dirk Steiner), and we would like to thank Larry James and three anonymous reviewers for their comments.
