

Lecture 1

An Introduction to the Human Body/ Surface Anatomy (pages: 1-23; 413-433)

1. Define anatomy, with its subdisciplines, and physiology.
2. Define each of the following levels of structural organization that make up the human body: chemical, cellular, tissue, organ, system, and organismal.
3. Identify the principal systems of the human body, list representative organs of each system, and describe the general functions of each system.
  - i. Integumentary System
  - ii. Skeletal System
  - iii. Muscular System
  - iv. Cardiovascular System
  - v. Lymphatic and Immune Systems
  - vi. Nervous System
  - vii. Endocrine System
  - viii. Respiratory System
  - ix. Digestive System
  - x. Urinary System
  - xi. Reproductive Systems
4. List and define several important life processes of the human body.
  - i. Metabolism is the total of all chemical reactions occurring in the body; it includes breaking down large, complex molecules into smaller, simpler ones as well as building the body's structural and functional components.
  - ii. Responsiveness is the ability to detect and respond to changes occurring outside the body and inside the body.
  - iii. Movement includes motion of the entire body, individual organs, single cells, or even structures inside cells.
  - iv. Growth refers to an increase in overall body size due to an increase in the number and/or size of cells, or the amount of substance surrounding cells.
  - v. Differentiation is the process by which unspecialized cells develop into specialized cells; stem cells are the cells which can divide and give rise to progeny that undergo differentiation.
  - vi. Reproduction is the process by which new cells are formed for growth, repair, or replacement or for the production of a new individual.
5. Describe the anatomical position and relate the common and anatomical terms used to describe various regions of the human body.

When describing any region of the body, it is assumed that the body is in the anatomical position, a standard position that ensures directional terms are clear so that any body part can be clearly described relative to any other part. In the anatomical position, the body is erect with the feet flat on the floor, and the upper limbs are at the sides with the palms facing forward.
