

Physical Characteristics of a Reservoir

Physical characteristics of a reservoir include original deposition and subsequent changes, the type of reservoir, sandstone or carbonate, which was discussed previously, depth, area, thickness, porosity, permeability, and capillary pressure.

Depth

The physical characteristics of a reservoir are greatly affected by the depth at which they occur.

Shallow reservoir— Created by the folding of relatively thick, moderately compacted reservoir rock with accumulation under an anticline or some trap. The hydrocarbons would generally be better separated as a result of lower internal reservoir pressures, less gas in solution and oil of increased viscosity, resulting from lower temperatures.

Deep reservoir— Typically created by severe faulting. The hydrocarbons would be less separated with more gas in solution and oil of reduced viscosity because of higher temperatures. There is often a reduction in porosity and permeability due to increased compaction.
