Chapter 6: Ethics

Teaching Perspective

Chapter 6 deals with the quality that differentiates public relations from most other practices: ethics. Today, with communications standards sagging, business leadership reputations skewered, and lying becoming more commonplace—no subject is more important for public relations professionals and students.

The ethical problems of the CEOs, sports stars, political figures, celebrities, even the Catholic Church — have had a profound impact on society. It's one thing when a celebrity icon like Tiger Woods or David Letterman admits to questionable behavior. But when the chief executives of some of America's most influential companies admit to cooking the books, duping the public, and outright lying to the shareholders, something is very wrong in our society.

In general, public relations practitioners in their unique role of representing both the organization's and the public's best interests, must be ethical in all that they do. This chapter, then, talks about the implications of ethics in public relations as well as in business, journalism, government, and organizations generally.

Subject of the From the Top interview in Chapter 6 is legendary New York practitioner Howard J. Rubenstein. Subject of the case study is Hewlett-Packard and how it grappled with the ethical misdeeds of former CEO Mark Hurd.

Among topics discussed in Chapter 6 are:

- Doing the right thing
- Ethics in business
- Corporate codes of conduct
- Corporate social responsibility
- Ethics in government
