1. Discuss how explorers' the following nations' motives for exploration differed from one another during the fifteenth century and how each was first impacted by their first contact?
  - Portugal: Vasco Da Gama: Navigator-Dom: was the first European to reach the east in 1498. Africa (route of gold) and eastward by sea to India. His route is largely ignored as the world because this that the Portuguese: Spanish-Domin: British: and France first searching them for its economic and take advantage of the native people instead and a different time with social anthropological studies and the concepts of artificiality of power.
  - Spanish-Domin: Columbus: while he was already Italian, he was hired by the Spanish to find a new route to India. He was believed to make it to India, but actually just made it to the Caribbean. He is therefore sometimes referred as "discovering this new world." This impacted their new location greatly as it opened more pathways to colonization following years of their own colonies, plantations, and mines and helped the native people.
  - England: John Cabot: came from Venice, but was hired by King Henry VII of England to explore northern England coastline. This is significant because England would eventually gain control of this entire northern coast of the eastern bay and start their first 13 colonies.
2. Identify and describe at least 3 major differences between the Spanish empire and Portuguese empire.
  - Portugal: started by Prince Henry, the Navigator, who had the right to monopolize empire, starting with the exploration of the coast of Africa to search for gold. Nothing is that about the Portuguese who trade that would monopolize territory. They eventually discovered it was better to sail this way the "back route." They wanted to trade and make gold, ivory, and slaves. Several years later they reached the Cape of Good Hope and began to colonize again from India and eventually to Southeast Asia, setting up trade bases in Asia. Eventually reaching parts further west, they dominated the spice trade and India and up their colonies into India, Africa, and elsewhere. The Portuguese were mostly paid to sail and profit from military forces, but ultimately were too weak for countries with a higher population, more resources, and the determination to establish colonies.
  - Spain: began their exploration after Portugal but quickly caught up with them due to their greater population and resources. They began reaching the Americas to discover the land and territory. However they could not monopolize this, by sailing west. Christopher Columbus, a Genoese-Italy Spain, showed that America just reached what he believed was Asia, but was actually the Caribbean. Eventually people caught on and Portugal and Spain formed an the world's exploration through the theory of "discovery," leaving Spain with much of North and South America. Privately, the Spanish
