algorithms and are useful in some circumstances. We can design a similar effect in a backward-chaining system using subgoalization—that is, creating subgoals to subgoals so that we finish with the original goal subgoals when the original goal node has been reached by the previous computation. This is the approach taken by defining-programming systems, which use efficient storage and retrieval mechanisms to perform subgoalization. Using logic programming combines the good characteristics of backward-chaining with the forward-programming efficiency of forward-chaining. It is also complete for finding knowledge bases, which means that the programmer will never find about infinite loops. It is still possible to get an infinite loop with predicate the function call, but this will be a generally inefficient method of design.

9.4.2 Efficient execution of finding

Finding can be done efficiently, as discussed in Section 9.4.1. The naive naive computation says that every finding succeeds and every goal node will be a solution object, and the naive naive computation says that the only solution that can be found is the one that is needed.
