

Seepage Analysis using Drainage Seepage Tank

Ayush Jain

Bachelor of Technology, Department of Civil Engineering, Vellore Institute of Technology, Chennai

Abstract - Seepage in soil engineering is movement of water through the soils, often a critical problem in building foundations. Seepage in ground water is dependent on many factors like Permeability of the soil, Pressure gradient, and also, between the combination of forces that acts on the water through gravity and other natural factors. Permeability may vary over a wide range, depending upon structure of soil, its composition, making possible the safe design of such structures as earth dams and reservoirs with a very low (negligible) leakage loss and other structures such as roadbeds and filtration beds in which rapid drainage is desirable. Hydraulic structures are very severely affected by the ground water seepage.

Key Words: Seepage Analysis, Permeability, Pressure Gradient, Drainage Seepage Tank, Height Gradient

1. INTRODUCTION

Seepage is slower movement of fluid or gas through pores or small holes in the structure. It may be seen in many civil structures but when we consider dams, canals, reservoirs seepage pressure throws an upward push to the structure and reduces the effective stress of within soil. If the seepage pressure is large enough, Soil below the foundation will be eroded and gets deposited at the end resulting a big void below the foundation leading it to collapse. Analysis can be performed using Drainage-Seepage Tank where we can change the dimensions, Pressure, Heads, Flow rate and can analyses the Seepage pressure.

1.1 DRAINAGE-SEEPEAGE TANK

The tank consists of a big sand tank separated through a sheet pipe and have a thin permeable sheet at the end. The advantage of using the tank is that it has adjustable height and width of the sand tank and heads.
