

The Terracotta Army, which is also called The Army of the First Emperor or The Terra-cotta Warriors and Horses, was built during the Qin Dynasty (221-201 BCE) in China. The local farmers in Lintong District, Xi'an, Shanxi province, discovered The Terracotta Army in 1974 while digging a well. This immediately caught the attention of historians because it was important historical material for them to study regarding the Qin Dynasty. Today, there are more than 8,000 sculptures discovered in Xi'an. They were in three main pits covering a total area of about 19,120 square meters. The Army was buried underground since all of the sculptures were the grave goods of Qin Emperor. (Function). Each of the terracotta warriors has different appearances, poses, and armor. The incredible vividness of the figures makes this a worldwide legend and one of "the eight miracles".

The Terracotta Army is as much an artistic statement as a bureaucratic one. It is incredible to think about the vast size of the undertaking and how many man hours it must have consumed apart from the vast amount of materials that had to be used to produce clay in such large quantities.

Essentially, The Terracotta Army is a representative of ancient Chinese sculpture. It realistically presented the combat scenario of the Qin army (how?). The facial expressions of the warriors are lifelike, and the expressions of them are respectively different. "A thousand people, a thousand faces and expressions" is a precise (word choice) description of the Army. While standing in the centre of the army of sculptures, visitors are able to feel the vitality of this army; all the vivid warriors with different expressions, holding different weapons from a sense of intensity, a scene of preparation for war.
