

AP Statistics & Investigative Grade 10

Question 10

An online survey asked the people who responded whether the percentage of students who will attend college will still over the coming century increase.

If the population were a sample of adults of 100 with a confidence interval of 95%, which category is an example of the correct perspective that the pollster should adopt in this case?

Question 10

The correct idea is that a 95% confidence interval for the percentage of adults who will attend college after high school would assume that responses are mutually independent. The sample is self-representative means that 95% confidence interval there are more than 1000 samples in the 100, there are no bias and representative without distortion of the population. However, the confidence and confidence interval would be appropriate to use that survey question is relevant.

The interval is between 75.2% and 84.8% after we use 95% confidence and because 75.2% and 84.8% of high school seniors plan attending college after high school. This means that 95% of surveys will sample, all 95% surveys will accurately reflect the population.

Question 10

Yes. The percentage of adults who will attend college after high school is 80% and $P = 0.05$.

Yes. The percentage of adults who will attend college after high school is 80% and $P = 0.05$.
