

Master's Thesis Proposal - Outline Template
Dr. James P. Davis, Associate Professor
Department of Computer Science and Engineering

Version Date: 9/26/02

This document provides my current thoughts on the structure, organization and content of an MS Thesis Proposal, required by the Department and the Graduate School, University of SC.

1. The proposal serves as the statement of the problem to be addressed, and the statement of work you intend to carry out in solving the problem.
2. The proposal can be, or can become (by morphing) the Chapter 1 of your thesis.
3. Thoughts on Content of the Proposal:

3.1 Introduction to the domain

This is some introductory statement about the domain in which the research is to be carried out. There may be more than a single domain, and so we need to structure the presentation of material in this section to introduce the reader to relevant information in these domains in some logical order. The sub-sections covering the various domains should be interconnected in a manner that allows the reader to make the appropriate connections of the material.

3.2 Brief, high-level survey of the Problem Background

This is some discussion about the context in which the identified problem is defined. We have some background, presented as introduction, and you are now doing the set-up for presenting the statement of the problem to be solved. This may be in the form of discussing various techniques or approaches, some chronological treatment of the domain(s), or some summary of the issues that are relevant to understanding the problem statement that follows.

Note that this section may be a description of the larger problem in which your specific "sub-problem" resides. You might be tackling a piece of a much larger problem and, therefore, you'll need to describe enough of this large problem in order to define the context for your reader about the landscape in which your problem resides.

3.3 Statement of the Research Problem

This is the rationale for what you will be doing and why it is important, why does it demand your attention. You might present this statement in terms of quantitative metrics or qualitative criteria, or you may simply state the problem in the form of one or more questions: "what if"?

Since research problems can be theoretical or applied in nature, the statement of the problem can vary according to these forms. So, it becomes a matter of what is most appropriate, given the type of thesis work that is to be conducted, the domain(s) in which the work is being done, and on the nature and scope of the problem to be solved.
