Abstract: This paper reports findings from a large-scale survey of teachers' beliefs about the role of the classroom in the development of students' mathematical understanding. The survey was conducted in 2001 and 2002 in 10 schools in the United Kingdom. The findings show that teachers' beliefs about the role of the classroom in the development of students' mathematical understanding are influenced by a number of factors, including their own experiences, their own beliefs about the nature of mathematics, and their beliefs about the role of the classroom in the development of students' mathematical understanding.

<sup>1</sup> The authors thank Katherine Thompson, Christopher and Judith Pappas for their kind suggestions and comments. But their occasional mistakes remain and their language remains not without blemish.—D. Klenz—Since completed correspondence: D. Klenz, University of Bonn. Other correspondence with Klenz from D. Klenz, University of Bonn.

The major results could easily be due to some bias in the sample from which they were obtained. It was thought that the following might be considered possible bias from nonrandomly taking about 1000 samples in each place, or that there was some bias in the sample. This appears to be a reasonable possibility, but it is not clear how it could be avoided. The results are not likely to be biased, but it is not clear how it could be avoided.
