 Thorsten Beck, Augusto de la Torre, 2006 Access to financial services or rather the lack thereof is often indiscriminately decried as a problem in many developing countries The authors argue that the problem of access should rather be analyzed by identifying different demand and supply constraints They use the concept of an access possibilities frontier drawn for a given set of state variables to distinguish between cases where a financial system settles below the constrained optimum cases where this constrained optimum is too low and in credit services cases where the observed outcome is excessively high They distinguish between payment and savings services and fixed intermediation costs on the one hand and lending services and different sources of credit risk on the other hand The authors include both supply and demand side frictions that can lead to lower access The analysis helps identify bankable and banked population the binding constraint to close the gap between the two and policies to prudently expand the bankable population This new conceptual framework can inform the debate on adequate policies to expand access to financial services and can serve as the basis for an informed measurement of
