Trading Range-Bound Markets in Forex Greg Michalowski,2013-03-25 While currency markets often exhibit long term trends that most traders love they sometimes lapse into trading ranges for extended periods of time In those environments traders need to adjust their approaches in order to capture profits from shorter and more frequent market swings In this video Greg Michalowski reveals tactics and strategies that work in markets where the fundamentals are unable to create a sustainable trend He asserts that traders should trade less wait for good trade location take partial profits when possible follow popular technical indicators be alert for technical failures and be quick to abandon fundamental views that are not borne out by price action Michalowski notes that in trending markets fundamentals overpower technicals In trading range markets technicals trump fundamentals That being the case he advocates that traders pay close attention to widely followed indicators including 100 day and 200 day moving averages Fibonacci retracements and simple trend lines and wait for multiple confirmations before entering a trade Citing several examples from the U S dollar market Michalowski demonstrates how an intersection of trend lines and the 100 and 200 day moving averages was a springboard to one of the biggest moves of 2012 For multiple time frame confirmation Michalowski suggests traders use daily hourly and five minute charts Once a move has started it should continue as long as the 100 day moving average trend line and Fibonacci retracements are not violated If these key technical levels are violated it s a signal to get out of the trade Filled with real world examples this video will teach you How to construct a long term technical map of the market How to profit in tight trading range markets How to risk a little capital to make more than a little in profits How to determine when a trading range is ending and new trend is emerging How to use key technical tools to time entries and exits Practical and easy to understand the insights and strategies in this video will give you the perspective to assess market movements and pinpoint low risk trading opportunities
