Abstract

Political sciences do not provide an appropriate theory of the human being required to understand different political cultures both in present societies as in that of the past history. The structural-genetic theory program has evidenced that humankind went from preoperational over concrete-operational to formal-operational stages, the latter one coming into being late in history. The materialist or economic type of theory examines the differences between pre-modern and modern societies against the backdrop of purely economic and socio-structural changes. Accordingly, it sees the causes of the emergence of modern industrial society in economic growth, i.e. as the result of capital accumulation and investment, or in purely socio-structural factors such as class struggle or power struggles in political control. It ignores or underestimates cultural and intellectual differences between the two types of society. Furthermore, it implicitly or explicitly holds the view that the human psyche has not actually changed in history. Typical representatives of this type of theory are the representatives of
