

Basics of Duct Design

This month we begin the first of HVACR Master's three-part series on ducts. Two duct design experts, JW Hall, Senior and Murray Munn, provide a wealth of information on this topic.

What is good duct design?

- 1. Low pressure drop
- 2. Low velocity
- 3. Low noise
- 4. Low energy consumption

Notice the design objectives. As you can see, there is no mention of air velocity. This is because air velocity is a result of the design, not a design objective.

- 1. Low pressure drop
- 2. Low velocity
- 3. Low noise
- 4. Low energy consumption

The main reason for low pressure drop is to reduce the energy consumption of the system. The main reason for low velocity is to reduce the noise level. The main reason for low noise is to provide a comfortable environment for the occupants. The main reason for low energy consumption is to reduce the operating costs of the system.

Velocity pressure (or velocity head)

Velocity pressure is the pressure exerted by the moving air. It is a function of the air velocity and the density of the air. The formula for velocity pressure is:

Static pressure (or static head)

Static pressure is the pressure exerted by the air at rest. It is a function of the air density and the height of the air column. The formula for static pressure is:

Total pressure

Total pressure is the sum of the static pressure and the velocity pressure. It is the pressure exerted by the air in motion. The formula for total pressure is:

Friction

Friction is the resistance to the flow of air through the duct. It is a function of the duct material, the duct size, and the air velocity. The formula for friction is:

Losses

Losses are the energy losses in the duct system. They are caused by friction, bends, and other factors. The formula for losses is:
