

Beyond the Big Five: Leader Goal Orientation as a Predictor of Leadership Effectiveness

Joseph W. Hendricks and Stephanie C. Payne
Texas A&M University

This study examined proximal traits as mediators of the relationships between distal traits and leadership effectiveness. Specifically, we examined goal orientation, leadership self-efficacy, and motivation to lead (MTL) as antecedents of leadership effectiveness, after controlling for the Big Five personality traits. We tested our hypotheses with a sample of 100 leaders of four-person teams performing a manufacturing task in a laboratory setting. Consistent with expectation, leadership self-efficacy partially mediated the relationships between learning goal orientation and Affective-Identity MTL as well as Social-Normative MTL, after controlling for the Big Five. Noncalculative MTL related significantly to averaged team member ratings of leadership effectiveness, after controlling for both the leader's and the team member's personality. These results help aid in our understanding of why leader traits relate to leadership effectiveness.

The study of leadership in organizations has been prevalent since the beginning of the 19th century. Thousands of research studies have focused on leadership phenomenon (Yukl, 1989) in part to enhance our ability to predict leadership effectiveness. A recent meta-analysis revealed that cumulatively the Big Five personality variables have a multiple correlation of .39 with leadership effectiveness (Judge, Bono, Ilies, & Werner, 2002). Although their work aided in demonstrating an empirical relationship between the Big Five and leadership criteria, their examination did not reveal why these relationships exist. As a result, the question of why individual differences predict leadership effectiveness remains unanswered.

Whereas the Big Five classification captures a broad array of dispositional traits, it is not a comprehensive taxonomy of all individual difference characteris-
