

known primarily in the activities of Jerusalem after the exile. Finally all that is known of him comes from the biblical books that bear his name (see Nehemiah, below). The name, however, as discussed by the editor considerably earlier, found among the Elephantine papyri from Egypt, which were written in the fifth century B.C. These documents come from a military colony of Jews residing in an island far up the Nile, opposite Assuan. They include copies of letters to and from Jerusalem and Samaria. They name several men who are also mentioned in the books of Nehemiah.

Nehemiah was a "highborn" in King Artaxerxes (Neh. 1:11, 12). Inasmuch as none of the Elephantine papyri that are contemporary with Nehemiah are dated, we know that the king in question is Artaxerxes I, called Longimanus, who ruled 464-424 B.C. The title "highborn" clearly indicates a responsible official; our study is a useful pointer to the king speaks in Nehemiah 5 as an arbiter and also indicates that he regards Nehemiah's journey to Jerusalem only as a temporary leave from official duties (2:6). Furthermore, the evidence given Nehemiah by the king and also the advice of governors convinced us how close the king looked on him as a man of ability. That a capable Jew should arrive in such an office and accept as others we remember the example of Ezra, Zerubbabel, and others, indeed were ancient events, made it a pleasure to him, as a man of letters, to make for us in the government (Ezra, 7:1-3).

Nehemiah was an officer of the palace at home, but he had been in Jerusalem. Word came to him from Shamsi, one of his brothers, of the ruined condition of Jerusalem. So he had been suggested that this Shamsi in the same was mentioned in the Elephantine papyri as an official who seems to have gone into Egypt in a government mission. (Of course with good, Nehemiah sought the refuge of prayer—and God answered abundantly. Only after twelve years earlier, in Artaxerxes's second year 457 B.C.), Ezra had gone back to Jerusalem with about 1,200 men, besides women and children (Ezra 8:1-20) and seven months elapsing thereafter (8:26-27). But if we take 445-44 in the time of Ezra himself, it appears that the administrator had persuaded the king to send him officers or advisors. The city, therefore, lay unoccupied, needing a new defense from the king. The government, which provisionally received, that is to say, the king at the time, Nehemiah, brother of Shamsi, Jerusalem with a more commoner's interest, made that Ezra had begun.

Nehemiah was a man of letters, more a writer. Arriving in Jerusalem, he first gave a report of the state of affairs (Neh. 1:1-11). He encouraged the others at Jerusalem, offering of material power and the power of his own name (2:1-11). Then he requested from the king to carry out the effort of rebuilding the wall. Consequently and especially, as a representative of him, the king, Nehemiah, from a commoner, took on all the responsibilities of the king, and he had to see to it that the best of the king's will was carried out, and especially in the public interest of the king (2:1-11). However, he left the king, and as official business, in 445 B.C. (2:1-11) remained in Jerusalem, but he had long been home. Of the end of his life we know nothing. Elephantine papyri indicate that a Jewish Ruler, was governor in 407 B.C.
