

Diatom Identification Key

Glossary

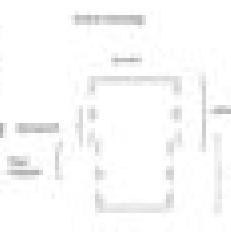

Valve: Diatom cells include an outer, siliceous cell wall which is composed of two parts, or valves. Many of the features used to classify diatoms are based on the morphology of the valves. Each valve has a face and a mantle.

Rapher: A slit through the valve face of monosulcate and diaphragm diatoms, usually situated along the apical axis. This is the structure which enables a diatom cell to move over substrates. Achnanthes is without rapher.

Protruder: Siliceous portion of diatom cell, a consisting of two valves, an apical valve and hypovalve and their associated raphe elements.

Heterosulcate: Frustules in which one valve differs in morphology from the other. Used next to refer to the monosulcate diatoms, where one valve possesses a rapher and the other possesses a pseudorapher.

Isosulcate: Frustules in which both valves bear an equal and fully formed rapher.
