

There is no lower, or general, underlying stage that functions, good or bad, as a source of information and self-knowledge. Self-knowledge can then proceed, characteristically, from the knowledge of a reality that is experienced and not yet understood, through other different levels, from lower to the highest and understood levels, a single degree at a time. Finally, knowledge stages follow after another until the knowledge level of characteristically understood reality is reached. Each different level is a specific knowledge, understood in relation to itself.
