Abstract: This article provides information for Extension professionals on the correct process of Likert data. The analysis of Likert-type and Likert-scale data requires unique data analysis procedures, and as a result, involves another technique when using SPSS. This article discusses the differences between Likert-type and Likert-scale data and provides recommendations for descriptive statistics to be used during the analysis. Once a researcher understands the difference between Likert-type and Likert-scale data, the selection of appropriate statistical procedures will be apparent.

Introduction

Over the years, numerous methods have been used to measure attitudes and personality traits (Likert, 1930). The difficulty of measuring attitudes, character, and personality traits lies in the procedures for measuring these qualities with a quantitative measure for data analysis purposes. The strong propensity of qualitative research techniques has influenced some of the confusion associated with the dilemma. However, many social scientists still rely on quantitative methods of attitudes, character and personality traits.

In response to the difficulty of measuring attitudes and personality traits, Likert (1930) developed a procedure for measuring attitudinal scales. The original Likert scale used a series of questions with five response alternatives: strongly approve (1), approve (2), undecided (3), disapprove (4), and strongly disapprove (5). He combined the responses from the series of questions to create an attitudinal measurement scale. The data analysis was based on the composite score from the series of questions that represented the attitudinal scale. He did not analyze individual questions. Since Likert used a five-point scale, other variations of his response alternatives are appropriate, including the addition of the neutral response (Casson & Gormley, 1986).

Likert response alternatives are widely used by Extension professionals. By the time of this article's preparation, at least 12 articles published in the 2011 Journal of Extension had used some form of a Likert response. In 2010, at least 27 articles published in the journal of Extension used the technique. The articles published in 2011 included 4-point Likert alternatives (Bendure & Kufus, 2011; Robinson & Shappard, 2011), five-point Likert alternatives (Kilian, Walters, Cunningham, Cates, & Nelson, 2011; Miller, 2011; Miller, Mungen, & Peters, 2011; Rosenkrantz, 2011; Smith & Davis, 2011; Waples, Smith, & Hill, 2011), six-point Likert alternatives (Chen, Kuehn, & Scales, 2011; Rosenkrantz & Miller, 2011; Wilson et al., 2011), and a seven-point Likert alternative (Waters, Wright, Walker, & Reed, 2011).

Other variations of the Likert response alternatives have become common in Extension research. Common usage has also created confusion or mistakes. One mistake commonly made is the improper analysis of individual questions or an attitudinal score. Before we discuss the analysis
