NERVOUS TISSUE

NERVOUS TISSUE AND HOMEOSTASIS The excitable characteristic of nervous tissue allows for the generation of nerve impulses (action potentials) that provide communication with and regulation of most body tissues.

Both the nervous and endocrine systems have the same objective: to keep controlled conditions within limits that maintain life. The nervous system regulates body activities by responding rapidly using nerve impulses; the endocrine system responds by releasing hormones. Chapter 18 compares the roles of both systems in maintaining homeostasis.

The nervous system is also responsible for our perceptions, behaviors, and memories, and it initiates all voluntary movements. Because this system is quite complex, we discuss its structure and function in several chapters. This chapter focuses on the organization of the nervous system and the properties of neurons (nerve cells) and neuroglia (cells that support the activities of neurons). We then examine the structure and functions of the spinal cord and spinal nerves (Chapter 13), and of the brain and cranial nerves (Chapter 14). The autonomic nervous system, which operates without voluntary control, will be covered in Chapter 15. Chapter 16 will discuss the somatic senses—touch, pressure, warmth, cold, pain, and others—and their sensory and motor pathways to show how nerve impulses pass into the spinal cord and brain or from the spinal cord and brain to muscles and glands. Exploration of the nervous system concludes with a discussion of the special senses: smell, taste, vision, hearing, and equilibrium (Chapter 17).

Neurology deals with normal functioning and disorders of the nervous system. A neurologist (noo-ROL-ə-jist) is a physician who diagnoses and treats disorders of the nervous system.

Did you ever wonder how the human nervous system coordinates and integrates all body systems so rapidly and efficiently?
