

Ancient Myth, Religion, and Philosophy

*"Progress, far from consisting in change, depends on retentiveness... when experience is not retained, as among savages, infancy is perpetual.
Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it... this is the condition of children and barbarians,
in whom instinct has learned nothing from experience."*

George Santayana

Thinking about the future has a rich and deep history.¹ There is much to be learned from past ideas and images of the future. In fact, contemporary views of the future, in many significant ways, are inspired and derived from earlier ideas and theories. Understanding our present views of the future requires looking at how different ideas and approaches to it have developed through the ages. The past puts the present into perspective; the present has been built upon the past. In biological evolution, many of the features of earlier life forms are carried over into later forms. Evolution in biology is to a great degree cumulative. The same is true for the history of future consciousness and, for that matter, the entire history of the human mind – ideas, insights, and discoveries build upon themselves. To borrow a metaphor from Isaac Newton, the futurists of the present can see outward as well as they can because they "stand on the shoulders of giants."

In this chapter, I examine the earliest recorded ideas, in printed word, on the future. These ideas build upon the prehistoric foundations described in the previous chapter and add new themes and concepts that have contributed to the ongoing evolution of future consciousness. Although prehistoric "mythograms" and other artistic representations may contain prophecies of the future, there is presently no accurate or reliable way to decipher the detailed meanings of these ancient images. According to J.T. Fraser, there is no clear evidence in prehistoric art that early humans thought in global or universal terms about either the past or the future.² Christian states that, as best as can be ascertained, prehistoric humans appeared to have thought in relatively concrete terms about local and specific concerns.³ Questions about the origin or destiny of the universe, or even of humankind, do not seem to have occurred to them. Still, it was the basic themes and concerns of prehistoric life – of reproduction and death, of hunting and the kill – that led to the development of future consciousness and the first recorded views of the future.

The earliest written ideas about the future dating back around five thousand years are mythological and contain both descriptions of the past and prophecies of the future, including explanations of the origin and purpose of humanity and the cosmos. Within these ancient myths past and future are causally and thematically connected – the future flows out of the past. These ancient mythic views of the origin, history, and future of humanity and the cosmos invariably contain references to deities, gods, and goddesses. The past
