Lecture 1 : BSC 110 Analytical Chemistry

What is Analytical Chemistry

- Science of chemical measurements
- study of matter to reveal details such as
 - composition
 - structure

It is the application of chemistry used to separate, identify, and quantify matter of interest (called analytes).

Qualitative analysis is the process of identifying the analyte.

Quantitative analysis is the process of determining the numerical amount of the analyte.

Applications of Analytical chemistry

- medicine, pharmacy (eg accurately developing drugs for consumption in correct amounts)
- industry and quality control (eg sewage treatment analysis of sewage content)
- forensics (eg investigate cause of death)
- agriculture (eg formulating of new fertilizers)
- engineering
- material science

Qualitative Tests

Selective test

Reaction that occurs with other substances, but exhibits a degree of preference for a particular analyte.

It favours a particular product, producing the product as a major product.

Specific test

Reaction that occurs only with particular analyte.

It does not favour a product, instead, it only produces ONE product.

Few reactions are truly specific. Many reactions are selective.

Quantitative Analysis

Involves detection, identification, quantitation, and separation.

Separation is important to perform better and more accurate analysis.
