

Freud's View of Human Nature: Psychoanalytic Theory Research

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Want to learn more about the view of human nature in psychoanalytic theory? This essay focuses on Sigmund Freud's view of human nature and explains the key concepts of his theory.

Introduction

According to Sigmund Freud's psychoanalytic investigation, human nature comprises some deep characteristics which yearn to satisfy particular needs and impulses such as aggression, the ego that drives him towards pleasurable experiences, the need for love and avoidance of pain in all areas of life. The impulses are considered to lead either towards good or evil, according to the nature of satisfaction they bring to an individual and the community at large. This research paper shall analyze Freud's view of human nature that became a considerable contribution to psychology.

Freud's View of Human Nature: the Concepts

The nature of the society, either civilized or barbaric, is a result of the personality type of people inhabiting the environment. It is also a function of the degree of moral standards set by society, which forms continuous suppression of human instinct, leading to the need for either reaction or compensation (Ziegler, 2002).

Freud, on his psychoanalytic perspective, argued that personality development is one of the significant characteristics of human nature that leads to a deeper understanding of the uniqueness of each person's life. Movement of individuals from one stage of life to another results in conflict between social and biological drive found within human nature. Freud's drive theory assumes that the ability of any individual to cope with his/her environment is determined by the individual's ability to deal with the forces within the society and learn from them.

His argument on psychosexuality was that the management of a child's sexual and aggression drives by the parents within the early stages of life contributes more
