

THE IMPORTANCE OF CONTEXT: QUALITATIVE RESEARCH AND THE STUDY OF LEADERSHIP

Alan Bryman,* Mike Stephens, and Charlotte à Campo
Loughborough University

The need for qualitative research in the study of leadership is growing and its importance in the field is beginning to be felt. This article outlines some of the advantages of qualitative investigations of leadership and reports the results of an investigation of police leaders' perceptions of which a qualitative approach was employed. Drawing on ideas from the New Leadership approach, data emerging from semi-structured interviews with senior police officers were analysed in terms of concepts deriving from typical New Leadership findings. While many findings were consistent with New Leadership approaches, some important divergent concepts have been employed in some and got as much less prominent in notions of what makes an effective leader than might have been expected from New Leadership research: by contrast, instrumental leadership was far more pervasive in police officers' thinking as to what is effective leadership. This means that such findings are specialized open, particularly with respect to the sensitivity to context that is a feature of qualitative research.

Qualitative research has become a more prominent style of research within the social sciences and within organization studies in recent years. The potential advantages of a qualitative research approach are well known and need not be rehearsed again here, save to draw attention to the empirical leverage it offers on the point of view of those being studied and the sensitivity to context that is especially attractive to researchers in a variety of fields. Within the specific field of leadership, there are signs of a growing interest in the use of qualitative research. While quantitative research will almost certainly continue to enjoy methodological hegemony within the field for many years, there is little doubt that qualitative research is beginning to make inroads into the field. The aim of this paper is to report and to reflect upon the significance of qualitative data on leadership collected in the context of the British police service. In so doing, we will be extending the well known
