1. Questions

As a manager, you have just received the results of an econometric study on the market for housing. Before this study, your understanding of the rental market (and its supply and demand) was based on a verbal description of a situation similar to a housing market that you had observed. Now, however, you have the demand curve and supply curve that you have just received. You have just paid the study. Before receiving the study, you had the opportunity to request the information. As a manager, before the econometric test and before the study of housing was done, would you have requested the study? Justify your answer by showing the importance of building economic models and how to use the data.

The case study (and a manager's decision) about the importance of building economic models is a good one. It is a good one because it is a good one. It is a good one because it is a good one.

(A good one because it is a good one. It is a good one because it is a good one. It is a good one because it is a good one.)
