

Is Corporal Punishment an Effective Means of Discipline?

4 pages | 998 words

Is disciplining children with corporal punishment ethical? This topic has been going on for centuries and remains a widely argued and debated issue. Corporal punishment not only carries the in-built danger of escalation, but it also impacts the child psychologically, infringes their right, and causes irreversible damages to their cognitive development. Children as society's smallest and vulnerable members deserve more, not less protection from assault, and they should be treated equally with dignity and respect. Corporal punishment infringes and denies the child's right from degrading treatments of punishments. Corporal punishment infringes the right to equal protection by allowing children to be physically attacked in the name of discipline. Every child has the right to be entitled to protection from abuse, exploitation, and violence. (UNICEF, 2011). These three factors can influence the child's transition to adulthood with adverse consequences later in life. With that, even a mild corporal punishment reflects a great invasion of rights and discrimination against children. Corporal punishment will eventually lead to other or more severe forms of abuse as its effectiveness decreases with each usage. Forms of corporal punishment would include hitting, kicking, spanking, pinching, forcing children to stay in uncomfortable positions, and using of different objects such as belts and sticks. The American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP, 1998) debated that "spanking will only instantly stop undesired behavior and its effectiveness will diminish with subsequent use". To preserve the initial impact that corporal punishment has on the child, the intensity with which it was administered must be methodically increased and this may quickly escalate into abuse. When children do not comply, parents and educators become desensitized to what they are doing and they move from light slaps to hard blows. This proves that corporal punishment is an ineffective strategy to discipline children. Corporal punishment has detrimental effects on the intellectual development of the child. Exposing the child to corporal punishment have been linked with changes in the brain structure and the child's performance at school. According to a study conducted by Rajalakshmi (2018), children who encountered corporal punishment at school were discovered to have lower levels of receptive vocabulary, reduced levels of executive functioning, and poor self-motivation when compared with children from another school where corporal punishment was prohibited. As a result, children are more likely to struggle with handling their emotions, muscle control, memory and learning capacities. According to another study conducted by Neuroimage (2010), it proposed that physical abuse (PA) was associated with structural brain modifications, fractional anisotropy (FA) of the corpus callosum and attenuated grey matter volume (GMV). Grey matter which is essential for proper brain development and functioning was found to be reduced as a result of corporal punishment. And that study concluded by stating that when children are subjected to harsh corporal punishments, it can lead to deleterious effects on the trajectories of brain development. (Neuroimage, 2010). Corporal punishment leads to serious consequences such as abnormalities in brain development and can affect the child's performance at school. As such, banish all forms of corporal punishment both in schools and homes and changing the teacher's and parent's mindset is crucial. Corporal punishment...
