

CPE PRACTICE TEST 3 & 4

SECTION 1

Part 1. Read and decide which answer best fits each gap.

In Praise of Face to Face Communication

Homo sapiens is a communicative creature and in our ordinary life, if we want something we tend to communicate automatically and directly in order to obtain it. As a species, we have developed very sophisticated methods by which we can communicate with (1) ever-increasing ease. Unfortunately, it seems that sometimes we are so dazzled by the brilliance of the technology we have at our (2) that we overlook the fact that the simplest, and often the most effective, means of communication is talking face to face to our target audience. (3), very often the more sophisticated the means of communication, the less effectively the message itself may be (4). After all, if we are face to face with a person, we can use body language to emphasise our (5) and check that we have been interpreted correctly. This is a far more effective way of communicating than using the underlining of words in a memo or (6) type in a report.

Home security

Home – it's one of the most emotive words in any language. The place itself has (7) people with privacy and security ever since individual dwellings first appeared nearly two million years ago. But nowadays, that sense of security has a twist. (8) safe people feel at home when they are away, they worry their home will be broken into. What's more, the fear is far from (9). In spite of falling burglary rates in the UK, a recent survey found that a house left unoccupied for a month a year is 43 per cent more likely to be burgled than an identical one that is never empty at night. Having someone (10) during the day is no (11) either about 55 per cent of domestic burglaries happen between 6pm and 6am. At the same time, people are spending longer away, on business and on holiday. Many are, therefore, prepared to (12) a little privacy, employing professional house-sitters to live in their homes in their absence.
