

The benefits of using a helicopter simulator

There is no doubt that aviation training using simulators offers a cost effective and safe alternative to training during actual flight. The real cost of helicopter training consists of many variables but includes the hourly costs associated with fuel, maintenance and insurance. Training in simulators provides a low cost virtually risk-free alternative allowing pilots to be trained for emergencies and other dangerous real world experiences.

Safety

Historically a large number of serious accidents have occurred when training in helicopters. Pilots and crew members have died or become seriously injured and expensive equipment has been damaged, often beyond repair.

Training in a simulator is totally safe even when practicing the most severe malfunctions under adverse weather conditions. Simulation based training allows for the training of maneuvers or situations that may be impractical (or even dangerous) to perform in the helicopter, while keeping the pilot and instructor in a relatively low-risk environment on the ground. For example, electrical system failures, instrument failures, hydraulic system failures, engine fires and even flight control failures can be simulated without risk to the pilots or helicopter.

Cost effectiveness

Flight simulation provides a significant economic advantage over training in an actual helicopter. Once fuel, maintenance, and insurance costs are taken into account, the costs of using a flight simulator are usually substantially lower than the operating costs of flying the helicopter for training purposes.

Regulations

JAR-OPS 3.965 and Appendix 1 effectively require training to be conducted in a simulator if available.

Pilot flying skills

Flight control malfunctions such as loss of control of the tail rotor, stuck pedals and malfunctions leading to a full down autorotation can be trained. Many of these malfunctions are not possible to practice in the helicopter or are considered unsafe to practice. Instructors can also provide students with a higher concentration of training tasks in a given period of time than is usually possible in the helicopter. For example, conducting multiple instrument approaches in the actual helicopter may require significant time spent flying the helicopter to a position where the exercise can begin, while in a simulation, as soon as one approach has been completed, the instructor can immediately re-position the simulated helicopter to an ideal (or less than ideal) location from which to begin the next approach.

Standardisation

It is important for helicopter operators to ensure that all crews are trained to the same uniform standard when confronted by changing weather and operational conditions. To ensure training is conducted for all crews under the same conditions the simulator environment can be controlled for many variable conditions including wind, visibility, daytime / night time, cloud ceiling, thunderstorms and outside air temperature. This ensures that all pilots will be trained and assessed under the same conditions.
