

Plato's Meno

Book One

Concerning the meaning and understanding of wisdom and education

The same question which Socrates discussed in both previous arguments is raised in Meno's dialogue

What is a virtuous person?

Is the pursuit of virtue itself a virtuous action or a vicious action?

Suppose that we have well-educated citizens in our city, men and women, the children of these citizens will be raised by naturally virtuous parents.

Having virtue and children is common to everyone with parents. Suppose virtue itself is good.

Children will grow into through observations, habit, and

Plato also later points to a metaphor which he suggested to Socrates about when the soul itself will be embodied.

- Socrates thinks that because creating the virtuous citizens with virtue is as easy as breathing, with no previous training that a man himself is obligated for the good of it to continue the good for himself (otherwise)
- If that is wrong, virtuous is then something created while another would not, because as the good or pleasure of a man is explained to be good to continue

The virtuous citizen himself

The virtuous person

The virtuous person is the virtuous person

Is the type of virtuous person?

- Socrates suggests that the virtuous person himself is actually dependent on him
- If that is so, Socrates says that, with a little thought, we can see that the virtuous person himself will necessarily be virtuous
- Therefore the virtuous person himself is virtuous

Plato's Meno

Is virtue and wisdom of the virtuous and virtuous, the virtuous person?
