Architecture

The APIs are exposed as XML Web Services which embrace open Internet standards (HTTP, XML, SOAP, WSDL) allowing it to be accessed and consumed from any client or Internet-enabled device.

XML Web Services

The API Web Services can be consumed using either the HTTP-POST or simple object access protocol (SOAP) protocols. A client program sends a request; the web service processes the request and sends a response. All parameters and return types of the operations supported by the Web service are XML strings. The client application is required to create or parse these XML strings to call the Web service or to use the data returned from the Web service. The SOAP protocol is primarily used to pass the parameters and return types are objects and need to be serialized and de-serialized during the data exchange. Since V12 API uses XML strings for parameters and return types and HTTP-POST protocol supports XML strings as data types, we recommend the client applications to use HTTP-POST to consume the Web Services to reduce overheads due to the SOAP protocol. However, SOAP protocol is also supported in its entirety and client applications wishing to use it can do so.

All API calls can be encrypted with SSL (that is, as HTTPS) to protect the privacy of the XML data.

In the case of the V12 API Web Services, the request header must include the user authentication information which is the session ID. The body of the message specifies the requested operation (such as TimePunch.Create) along with any applicable parameters (such as the data for the punch transaction).

The requests that a web service can process are defined in a web services definition language (WSDL) file in XML. The WSDL file describes the operations that the web service can perform, the required parameters for each operation, and the response for each operation.

Call Sequence

For each API call, the client application typically:

- Prepares the request by defining request parameters, if applicable
- Invokes the call, which passes the request with its parameters to the XML Web service for processing
- Receives the response (synchronous) from the XML Web service
- Handles the response, either by processing the returned data (for a successful invocation) or by handling the error (for a failed invocation).
