Abstract

A method has been developed for determination of bromate and bromide in water containing high concentrations of chloride (e.g. seawater). Separation of bromate and bromide on an anion-exchange column was followed by ICP-MS detection. To reduce interference of chloride with determination of bromate and bromide, and to avoid clogging, ammonium salts, for example $\text{NH}_4\text{H}_2\text{PO}_4$, $(\text{NH}_4)_2\text{HPO}_4$, $(\text{NH}_4)_2\text{CO}_3$, and NH_4NO_3 were examined as mobile-phase components. It was found that mobile phase containing 20 mM NH_4NO_3 at pH 5.80 was compatible with the anion-exchange column and enabled reasonable resolution and separation of bromate and bromide within 7 min. Detection limits for bromate and bromide ranged from 2.0 to 3.0 $\mu\text{g L}^{-1}$ for direct injection of 50 μL sample without matrix elimination. The proposed method was used for analysis of bromate and bromide in seawater.

Introduction

Among the wide variety of techniques available for determination of bromine species, anion-exchange chromatography (IC) with a variety of detection methods, including conductivity, spectrophotometry, and inductively coupled plasma mass spectrometry (ICP-MS), is often used [1]. Suppressed IC with conductivity detection, the most common procedure for analysis of bromate, bromide, and other anions [1–3], is based on suppression of the conductivity of the mobile phase by use of a suppressor column. Chloride is often present in 100-fold excess over bromide in seawater and, because the column is overloaded when the chloride concentration is very large, it interferes by eluting very near to bromate and bromide. Although an approach based on post-column reaction (PCR) and UV detection is an attractive alternative for determination of bromine species [4–7], these methods may not be suitable for analysis of seawater, in which chloride is present in very large excess over bromide [8]. A new mode of IC separation, electrostatic IC, has recently been used for analysis of seawater to avoid the matrix problem [9, 10].

IC coupled with ICP-MS has been used for the determination of inorganic anions [1] because ICP-MS has several advantages, for example high selectivity in SIM mode and a wide linear dynamic range of detection [11]. IC-ICP-MS with both suppressed ion chromatography [12–16] and non-suppressed anion chromatography has recently been successfully used for determination of bromate and bromide in a variety of matrices [17–21]. Although IC-ICP-MS methods are useful for determination of bromate and bromide, they have not yet been used for analysis of bromide in seawater.

For these reasons we have investigated use of a variety of ammonium salts as mobile phase components for determination of bromate and bromide in seawater. Because seawater contains a high concentration of Cl^- , it might be difficult to separate Cl^- from bromate by anion-exchange chromatography. Because ICP-MS is highly specific and sensitive, however, in contrast with conventional detection in IC, for example conductivity and UV, even at high matrix concentrations it is possible to use
