

The following table contains the estimated coefficients as well as their corresponding standard errors from all the regressions. Results in a box imply that differences were statistically significant. The goodness-of-fit (adjusted  $R^2$ ) is also reported for each of the regressions and is found in the last column of the table. The last column of the table contains the  $F$ -test for the null hypothesis that the coefficients on the variables in the model are all equal to zero. The  $F$ -test is significant at the 1% level for all regressions.

With regard to the two spending programs, even if money flows into the states and they implement "best" defense policies, money for the military can't be used for anything else. A change in the location of production would deprive it of its main source of funds. However, the same principle applies to the private

Another important role which is played by environmental factors in a child's brain maturation is the frequency of stimulation. Environmental factors contribute to the child's brain development by stimulating the growth of synapses. Stimulation is provided by sensory input from the environment, which is processed by the brain. The more stimulation a child receives, the more synapses are formed, and the more complex the brain's circuitry becomes. This is why it is important to provide a rich and stimulating environment for a child's brain development.
