How to Design Subnational Fiscal Rules Luc Eyraud, Andrew Hodge, Mr. John Ralyea, Julien Reynaud, 2020-02-25. This note discusses how to design subnational fiscal rules, including how to select them and calibrate them. It expands on the guidance provided at the national level on rule selection and calibration in IMF 2018a and IMF 2018b. Thinking on subnational fiscal rules is still evolving, including their effectiveness, for example, Heinemann Moessinger and Yeter 2018, Kotia and Lled 2016, Foremny 2014, and this note only provides a first analysis based on international experiences and the technical assistance provided by the IMF. Main findings are summarized in Box 1. The note is divided into five sections. The first section defines fiscal rules. The second section discusses the rationale for subnational rules. The third section provides some guidance on how to select the appropriate rules and whether they should differ across individual jurisdictions. The fourth section explores the issue of flexibility by looking at how rules should adjust to shocks. Finally, the last section focuses on the calibration of the rules.

Given the central importance of public financing to make progress towards universal health coverage (UHC), government policy on benefit design, including both service entitlements and conditions of access, significantly influences health system performance. Benefit design considers how all public funds are used and should be based on evidence and developed through a systematic process involving key stakeholders. Reducing uncertainty over entitlements and conditions of access in particular, co-payments both reduces barriers to accessing services and improves financial protection. Finally, aligning benefit design with a range of health financing policies, as well as service delivery objectives, provides a powerful way through which policy makers can drive positive change in their health systems.
