Throughout the preceding chapters, techniques and strategies for collecting and organizing data have been discussed. With a partial exception for Chapters 4, 6, and perhaps 7, in which limited analytic procedures are mentioned, analysis of data has not yet been extensively discussed. And yet, all qualitative data, from interviews to fieldwork, need to be coded and analyzed in order to derive meaningful findings from them. Interestingly, we use the same basic tools and techniques to analyze any of these forms of data. In this chapter, the task of qualitative data analysis is finally considered at length. The techniques of content analysis serve as both a qualitative research method in its own right and as the backbone of most qualitative analysis.

The instructions in this chapter are intended to assist researchers in their attempt to learn the methodological technique(s) for standard, or basic, content analysis. These techniques are sufficient for most purposes. But the reader should recognize that many more intricate and specialized variations are possible, some of which you may encounter in your readings in the field.

The chapter begins with a brief explanation of what content analysis is in an effort to orient the discussion. Next, I offer a brief discussion of analysis approaches in qualitative research. Following this, some general discussion on concerns and debates regarding content analysis are presented. Then, a number of procedures for analyzing content are examined. These include consideration of what counts as content and what to analyze, the nature of levels and units of analysis, and how to effectively employ coding frames. In the next section, analytic induction is examined in relation to content analysis procedures. We will consider forms of nontextual content, such as visual and spatial analysis, and discuss what to look for in content analysis software.
