1. Introduction

Many patients presenting for urological surgery have chronic renal disease (CRD). They have unique pathophysiology relating to both CRD and its underlying cause and therefore present a challenge to surgeons and anaesthetists. Considerable advances in renal replacement therapy (RRT) and renal transplantation mean that a greater number of these patients are presenting for anaesthesia to assist vascular access procedures and renal transplantation. As their survival increases they also present more frequently for surgery unrelated to their renal disease. The aim of this article is to present the features of CRD that influence the conduct of anaesthesia and to introduce some of the anaesthetic techniques used for this group of patients.

1.1. Aetiology of CRD

The aetiology of CRD is varied. In the UK the most common causes are diabetes (30%), hypertension

(24%) and glomerulonephritis (17%). In 20% of cases the cause is unknown. The effects of renal disease are seen in all organ systems and mediated by accumulation of toxic metabolic products and endocrine dysfunction.

1.2. Prevalence of CRD

In 2002 there were an estimated 140,000 patients in the UK with CRD under the care of renal physicians. 37,000 patients were undergoing renal replacement therapy: 46% with a renal transplant, 37% haemodialysis, and 16% with ambulatory peritoneal dialysis [1].

2. Pathophysiological and pharmacological changes relevant to anaesthesia in patients with CRD

2.1. Physiological effects

CRD causes multi-system dysfunction. This can be mediated by the primary disease process causing
