

These are the main functions of the PEAR DB library for accessing a database:

- DB::connect('string'); We use this function to connect to a particular database.

The string is a concatenation of strings with different meanings. First part of the string is a string that represents DBMS software, such as mysql, oci8, ifx etc. The DBMS software part of the string is followed by the "://" separator. After the separator, we have the user account, separator ":" and the appropriate password. The end of the string is separated by the "@" separator. At the very end, we give the server's name and the directory of a database we want to connect to.

The database connection information is kept in a variable ($a), and that variable is used when applying operations to this database.

- DB::isError($a); This function can be executed after each database access operation.

It takes the connection variable as an argument and returns the boolean which is True if an error happened when trying to connect to a database or False if the connection has been established.

If there was a problem with the connection, the program can be terminated by using the "die" function. The "die" function is usually followed by the error message stored in the connection variable $a, which can be shown by the $a->get_message.

- $a->setErrorHandler(PEAR_ERROR_DIE) This is an alternative function for checking the errors after database commands.

In this case, the $a variable is a query variable. If errors occur, this function terminates the program and shows us the error messages.
